Sick of rising electricity bills and power outages?

I came across a geography teacher who's now helping thousands of people after developing a simple DIY home-power system...

Originally designed to see his family through power outages, it turned out this device also drastically cut his monthly electricity bills when not being used in an emergency.

He's achieved this using a similar technology to that being used in today's electric cars, where a small amount of energy in a system is dramatically multiplied by what's known in physics as the 'spinning principle.'

He set out with 3 main aims:

It had to be cheap and easy to obtain (or build)

It had to be easy to move and completely safe

It had to use a constant source of power to create energy – so no dependency on sun, gas or wind

It seems that with a little help he's achieved this and more... and now he's teaching people how to create their own.

To see if this could work for your home, take a quick quiz by tapping the image below:
